What factors influenced results

During the fund's fiscal year, the U.S. experienced strong consumer spending, a healthy labor market and easing inflation. Overseas, however, major developed economies began to stagnate towards the end of the period, with mixed results across Europe and the Asia-Pacific region. Among emerging economies, India and Brazil demonstrated resilience, maintaining growth over the period, while low consumer confidence and weakness in the real estate sector hampered China's market.

Nearly all equity sectors produced positive absolute returns for the fund, with shares of information technology, communications services and industrial companies particularly adding to results. Shares in the consumer discretionary, financial, real estate and health care sectors also produced positive overall returns. Geographically, shares of companies based in Taiwan, the United States and India added to the fund's performance.

Meanwhile, holdings in the energy sector produced negative overall returns for the period. Shares of companies based in Norway, Portugal, Poland and Hungary also declined on an absolute basis.
